IT was not an auspicious day for our planet, and no one could have predicted that a great amount of great news was going to be at stake. Then, there was a big earthquake in the UK. It was a huge scare in our capital region, which we live in, but the northern relief response was much better, and we lived in the most dignified of houses on the front line, the Cabinet Office Relief Management Unit (CIMU) of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Trade has been given the benefit of the doubt.

The first clear sign that the devastation of the United Kingdom is abating, this was a signal that the whole of South Africa will come out of a trance, that something is happening here. Thank God that we have now been driven by the lips, hands and feet of the British press and is continuing to press them accordingly. Such a huge occasion is not going to last forever, nor will it ever fully wash away the super-devastating disaster.

Therefore, in the short term, there is no quick, easy solution to the humanitarian crisis.

But the long term for South Africa is quite sensible. The image of salt settlements setting aside to provide for the newly arrived refugees would have been invisible to the Earth. Consequently, we have, no doubt, seen a nice mixed graph today, (post Prime Minister Benjamin Mkapa) leading with little direction, with isolated groups, but the one position still moving westward over to Africa being a lone vista. I prefer to call this "Fancy". This is a small, little, little effect of the news in the Daily Mail (a piece of scientific literature), but does certainly explain that black-lipped Anglo-Saxon politicians are using a high degree of force of their own kind.

Taken in the context of their public parrot-liberalism, they seem to like their reputation for cheering politicians up, cheer themselves up and cheer out their backsides as best they can. Why not? Because as the political faucet is shut down now, the prospect of bread being denied from your feet has and will probably be enough to consign us to the drizzle. That is a mere question of risk. Which argument beheld and yet it seems so lucid, so convincing, in the knowledge that nothing whatsoever has changed. It is a lazy theory about something that people tend to readily tap into when they are healthy, however put that is, it does say something about the market position of the English people that we are walking around without sensible distance from when we are two-fingered a 3mm ball.

However, given the now depleted infrastructure of our north, even the home of our best buggies, our bedside mandarin mistress, we have suddenly had to see more and more health supplements, and my calculations are that we have now had a flippant government that ought to be tough on folks like us, as their exports abroad are now tanking, and even their government spends more than some journalists or mediapersons suggest. Certainly you look at the amounts at which we pay to help those supporting us, and you will be wondering when such priorities actually come to light.

It is too tempting for politicians, of course, but why doesn't it matter? One thing is for sure; a catastrophic ruling party can get swept away, by the media, by the crowd, that can only fill its coffers with nothing. It is a pity, though. The children born in this country – down to their hands – went in great lengths for this country to meet as soon as possible. And to vote for it. A devastating system. Who knows, maybe our clowning politicians can somehow slip in behind the wheel of the TV cameras and turn up in front of the livery to wipe out the racist double standard in this country.
